It's very American to not discuss death or mourning. We should talk about death more often. We never really "move on," and that's okay. We think there's a past, present, and future; but, really, we live in many different moments. We constantly go back and remember things and people who are no longer with us. I think about my dad, who died twenty-two years ago, all the time. Almost every day, at one moment, I think of him. That's just part of life. Time is never linear. We're always going back and forth.

Pattern : Code (video)

Pattern : Code reactivates the innate connections between weaving and computing, and examines the interrelationships between technology, craft, and women’s labor.

I am a multi-disciplinary artist working in video, new media, and textiles. I came to my art practice through an unlikely path: working in user experience design at Apple and HP Labs. Like a UX designer, I methodically research, gather data, and synthesize findings, but as an artist my data points capture human memories, emotions, and experience. I piece together larger truths these data points reveal and connect them to patterns in history and society around craft, technology, labor, and gender.
