A poorly-conducted University shutdown - A small cell of radical students - Plans - For reinvention - and the Refutation of knowledge. On the brink of adulthood. In the shadow of the 20th century.

LONG SYNOPSIS

At the butt-end of a college shutdown, the hasty firing of faculty and ushering-out of non-senior students has left a single professor, Mr. Dross, teaching every class to the remaining seniors. With less than a month to graduation, a politicized cell of students calls for rebellion. From the seed of belief that a final year of tuition is being extorted from them, five youths turns their blame toward the professor, toward their school, and eventually toward the entire societal edifice around them. Through failed attempts to radicalize their fellow students, these core five spend two nights in a thick cloud of unchecked ideology, where egos clash, comrades are manipulated, and the questioning of accredited degrees unfolds into the questioning of knowledge itself. Trivialities like numbers and days of the week are rejected in an environment of distrust and anxiety toward the oncoming gray of "adult life" -a future that is periodically de-propagandized with glimpses into Professor Dross' personal life. Correspondence with his mother and vignettes of his failing marriage are counterbalanced by whispers of how that romance began, in the student protests of 1968.
