Introduction

JULIA HAFT-CANDELL

The Infinite Library is an evolving collection of books and texts recommended by artists working in clay, creating an archive of ceramic theory in a method that is emerging rather than top-down.

The Library redresses some common misconceptions about clay: ceramics is considered an expressive, elemental, and bodily medium, disconnected from thinking and writing. While expression and action can be components of working in clay, its physical qualities can exist while considering the many theories, stories, and philosophies that drive ceramic practices.

To compile The Library, I contacted artists of varying ages, career stages, and geographical locations, asking for titles that have influenced their life and work. I left parameters very open to avoid any genre or style hierarchy. Artists could write notes on their choices but were not required to submit any explanation.

This publication marks the project's second realization. The first, at Pitzer College Art Galleries in 2023, shared books from 66 artists. The latest installation at Santa Clara University's de Saisset Museum includes recommendations from an additional 11 artists, now totaling over 500 texts. They piece together an anthology that can be used in teaching, learning, and discussion, forming an unexpected ceramics library that can inform those working within the medium and provide greater context for those seeking to understand its complexities.

> The Disappearance of Rituals: A Topology of the Present Byung-Chul Han

Contemporary philosopher Byung-Chul Han takes an in depth look at the decline of ritual in modern society. Han describes ritual practice as a process of making yourself at home in the world and making time habitable, a way of orienting ourselves around ritual objects that pass down generations, creating stability and a sense of belonging. His theory highlights the slipperiness of the current moment, in which we find ourselves drowning in an unending stream of new information and imagery. Surrounded by a late-stage capitalist culture, we are prompted to consume a torrent of cheaply made mass produced objects, in an attempt to furnish and fulfill our lives.

> Poetry is Not a Luxury from Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches Audre Lorde

I found this book to be cathartic. It put a finger to a sentiment I had been having trouble articulating: that ritual may be integral to a generative object-making practice, one that feels nourishing rather than extractive. But in a world that no longer holds an understanding and respect for the ritual object, this realization is melancholic. It leaves one feeling that there is a pressing need to re-member our communities and connections to the people, beings, and places of our present.

Poetry is Not a Luxury is poetic, fluid and bursting with optimism. The way Audre Lorde's words wind back and forth over and around themselves conjures a familiar choreography to that of clay and fiber craft practices. Lorde redefines the erotic as the essential creative impulse of humanity, a playful instinct for collaborating and making new ideas and realities possible. The erotic is the sharing of joy, found in the places where you come to meet others and form bridges. It is dancing, singing, cooking, and craft-those intangible cultural practices that bind us to each other, our land, and our ecologies. Lorde disregards the capitalist impulse toward individualism-to engage with ourselves is to be engaged in community. This text seems crucial reading as we learn to move beyond the cult of the artist-genius and the institutionalized hierarchy of academia that goes alongside it.

• The Living Stones: Cornwall Ithell Colquhoun

Ithell Colquhoun was a queer, British surrealist painter who, during the 1940s, lived and worked in a remote village in Cornwall, UK at the edge of the island. This area is famed for its enduring folk customs, its wild landscape, and its neolithic monuments. The Living Stones reads as a studio diary and travelog of the area. To read it is to time-travel into this ethereal landscape with Ithell as your guide. Collquhoun's subtle and reserved descriptions are threaded with an animist connection to land, place, and culture, and the book exemplifies a relational artistic practice.

> Always Coming Home Ursula K. Le Guin

I think this book is Le Guin's most realized example of her Carrier Bag Theory. It reads as an anthropological study of a people yet to come, the inhabitants of a post-anthropocene California, thousands of years from our present. For her fictional Kesh people, Le Guin invented songs, poems, cultural objects, ideologies, tools, ceramics, architectures, animals, land practices and crafts. She worked with a musician on an accompanying record of folk songs played on instruments designed specifically to emulate the Kesh way of thinking. These songs were so convincing, they had trouble copyrighting the material. They were told you can't copyright folk songs, that they belong to the people. Le Guin's craft is powerful and she has given so much to us in this text.

Embedded within its encyclopedic volume is a three part novella told from the perspective of North Owl, who is born into the Kesh valley as a half house person. Her father is an outsider. In her adolescence, she must travel to the edges of her world and enter the society of her father: a patriarchal monotheism, not unlike the western colonial ethic we might recognize from our own world. By following North Owl on this journey, we learn how to see the structures that bind us with both eyes open. If I have to choose one Le Guin book to recommend, it's this one. Always Coming Home speaks to them all. It is her life's work. Her Carrier Bag Theory pointed to the path, and Always Coming Home will show us how to walk it.

The Girl With the White Flag Tomiko Higa

'The Girl With the White Flag' is an autobiographical account of childhood survival during the battle of Okinawa. Tomiko Higa was 5 years old when she was separated from her family, and while bombs rained down on the island, Tomiko sought safety, sustenance, and companionship among the non-human beings she was raised in familiarity with.

I am Uchinaanchu (Okinawan), and it has been difficult for me to access narratives translated to English that provided me with the specificity this book is filled with. The land and people of the Ryukyu (Okinawan) islands are stereotypically defined through a lens of conquest and empire, but this text offers self-definition through relationships to land and nature, which is an important component of my practice with clay. There is agony and magic in this amazing account, and it impacted the shape of my life.

I find this text to be such a beautiful conversation about art, life, poetry and clay. Magdalene Odundo's work has had a big impact on my practice, since I first saw it as a BFA student in London many years ago, and this conversation with the poet Ben Okri is one that I have enjoyed immensely.

 Monique Wittig

The Vice Consul and The Ravishing of Lol Stein are how I learned about French Feminist Theory, besides reading Luce Irigaray. I am working on an ongoing series of portraits based upon Wittig's epic poem Les Guérillères. Witting challenges the role of gender in the French language. I stretched and interpreted her series of vignettes in Les Guérillères, exploring non-gender specific, lesbian and genderfluid portraiture in my ceramic works dating from 2014 - present.

> • The Vice-Consul Marguerite Duras

• The Ravishing of Lol Stein Marguerite Duras

I based a series of works on Duras in the late 1980's, a series of cast bronze wigs, that were portraits of women without objectifying them. I reflected upon the woman as an absence in Duras' writing. The woman is always pursued and never found.

CANDICE I IN

The Intimacies of Four Continents Lisa A. Lowe

This work helped me think through connections between some of the material-based research I have done into global commodities like porcelain, tea, cochineal, indigo, opium and sugar. I thought about these connections in relationship to domestic interiors depicted in the Victorian literature I grew up reading, as well as between Asian indentured labor, plantation slavery, and the plants and products that emerged from these plantation economies and labor.

> Animacies: Biopolitics, Racial Mattering, and Queer Affect Mel Y. Chen

Coming from an art semiotics background, I immediately loved how Mel used a linguistic framework to think through the racial, sexual, and gendered rhetoric surrounding charged matter and deftly dealt with heavy, dark histories with precision and perversity.

> The Tiger Flu Larissa Lai

The Tiger Flu is this amazing science fiction book (loosely connected to Salt Fish Girl, also by Larissa Lai) that thinks through virology, regeneration, cloned and hybrid species entanglements, corporate control of the environment, new forms of kinship, deep memory, and time. I haven't loved a science fiction story this much since N. K. Jemisin's Broken Earth trilogy.

Srikanth Reddy

This poem is an erasure poem written from the autobiography of Kurt Waldheim, the UN Secretary General whose voice is on the Voyager Record NASA sent out into space in the 1970s to greet extraterrestrials or future humanity with a representation of humanity (full of all the limitations and problems you can imagine such a project would expose). It becomes a poem about power and world in the most sparse and heart-hitting way. Reddy cuts Waldheim's text, originally a bit of a soft-power pedaling to try to exonerate himself from Nazi war crimes, and it becomes a tale into the inferno of human greed, desire, and violence. I've made work in response to the Voyager record's history and Reddy's poem, teach his poem in my classes, and continue to return to it all the time.

Undermining: A Wild Ride Through Land Use, Politics, and Art in the Changing West Lucy R. Lippard

In this book, Lucy Lippard looks back at 60s-70s U.S. land art and reconsiders some of her critical takes from that era. I admire her for publicly revising her ideas more than 40 years later, as well as her commitment to her own local art world in New Mexico, where she lives. I wish more canonized art writers would revise/correct/amend their writing as part of a public practice! Lippard is far from perfect, but it seems like she's trying to own that.

Khalili's interests and experiments have been enormously influential on my practice and its connections between ceramics and soil. - Horizontalism: Voices of Popular Power in Argentina edited by Marina Sitrin

I learned about horizontalism during the Occupy movement in 2011-2012 and immediately recognized in it aspects of the work of Brazilian artists Lygia Clark and Lygia Pape. The different voices edited together in this book have helped me envision alternate ways of living life, of coming together with others, and of supporting all life that is really different to how I grew up. I currently manage a ceramics facility as part of my academic job, and culturing the studio so it is a place where people can be sideways and sensitive (a beautiful phrase from Julius Eastman) is a big part of my job.

The Psychoanalysis of Fire Gaston Bachelard

Better known in the art world for his book The Poetics of Space, in this volume, Bachelard ruminates on fire and all its metaphoric richness. In my work, I am interested both in harnessing fire and in how objects and ideas get buried and excavated. The psychoanalytic world view is a fascinating one for me-at the very least it highlights how it is not just our brains holding memories and emotions, but our bodies, and every vessel overflows eventually! How do we attend to the leaks and escaping steam? This is a crucial question.

I have a lot of books. Many years ago, when I began to make the books that I owned, I often questioned why I had so many books. They were important to me because I didn't get rid of them and I moved them with me from place to place. At that time, I didn't read books so much as I looked at them. Besides the covers and pictures that I loved to lose myself in, I was comforted by the idea of a book, that is, a collection of words, thoughts, pictures, and stories all sandwiched between two pieces of cardboard. I am comforted by the smell of old books. I love finding old photos and notes that I've left behind. In used books, I am always excited to find the former owners' names, inscriptions, birthday notes, highlighted sentences, and abandoned bookmarks.

These books have meant a great deal to me at specific times in my life. They've helped me take my medicine, be okay with being a weirdo, be inspired, see the world through weirdo-colored glasses and appreciate it, start smoking Pall Mall cigarettes, be creative, ignore the rules of grammar because that is a way of seeing too, enjoy simple things like breathing, sleeping, looking at pictures, and the taste of hot water, not feel so isolated, develop a dark sense of humor, and feel better about my isolated times of woe because no one is as miserable as a 20th century Russian Poet.

All are stories, tales, truths, I come back to again and again. Some have made me cry, others I find enlightening or expand on a sense of value. I was introduced to 'The Crock of Gold' in 1962 by a college roommate...a quirky, fanciful novel taken from Irish fables. Stephens spins odd tales of power struggles between Leprechaun couples with remarkable emphasis on the magical power of the women.

Under the Palm Trees: Modern Iraqi Art with Mohamed Makiya and Jewad Selim Ahmed Naji

I love Jewad Selim and the Baghdad Modern Art Group's work and in this book, one gets to see his sketches and inspirations that eventually developed into beautiful paintings and sculptures. He's an artist who knew how to meld influences from the East and West, something that appeals to me in my practice. I've been mining these works on the internet, and wanting so badly to have a proper publication of them to add to my library so I was ecstatic when I found out this book existed. These images remind me of how my mother used to paint, she was inspired by the people of Baghdad, the architecture and the landscapes in a similar way, and being surrounded by her work at a young age really shaped my understanding of art and the warmth and beauty of a place and its people.
