My artistic practice combines painting, sculpture, and found objects to question how screens shape our perception. Fascinated by visual repetition, I explore the boundaries between the real and the virtual, art and industry, extending this reflection to screens in a broad sense: phones, iPads, computers, and mirrors.

My works examine the relationship between private screens and intimate space, transforming intimacy and the virtual through the language of painting. By blurring the line between the digital and the real, I use humor as a form of visual resistance, reducing the distance between elitist art and popular culture.

Ruimin Ma develops a practice that questions the image and its analogical supports in the age of digital technology and hyper-connectivity. By rubbing the irreducible time of sculpted or painted works against the instantaneous nature of artificial intelligence, she confronts interfaces and iconographies while combining traditional and technological know-how. In the museum context, the artist imagines new artistic genealogies by playing with spatial and societal dualities.

From the museum to the cybercafé, the artist links these spaces through Centaur Warrunner. The reference sculpture depicts a combat scene in which Theseus rides the centaur and prepares to strike him with a club. Ruimin Ma reenacts this computational construction by translating it into a papier-mâché piece—her preferred material—here combined with a sound system and line drawing. The drawing takes inspiration from the game design of Dota 2, an online multiplayer battle-arena game. Through this shift, a connection emerges between mythological combat and a form of entertainment based on the ambivalence of a group activity performed in solitude.

Through this path—both didactic and playful—Ruimin Ma reaffirms the necessity of “using humor as a form of visual resistance, reducing the distance between elitist art and popular culture.”

Inspired by Theseus Fighting the Centaur Biénor, the work transposes the myth into a digital universe. Using the centaur's equipment from Dota 2, it blurs the boundary between the real and the virtual, each strike linking past and present, fiction and reality.

"Look here, smile!"

The screen has transformed the way we see the world. Inspired by Les Trois Maries au Sépulcre by Nicolas-Auguste Galimard, I altered the point of view: the two Maries originally shown in profile become, in my work, two front-facing figures taking a selfie on the screen of a sculpted phone. Through this shift, I invite the viewer to reconsider the relationships between looking, recording, and existing.

Inspired by L'Esprit de la lumière, I reinterpreted the dialogue between sculpture and light by introducing an artificial source. The figure holds a phone whose green glow replaces daylight and illuminates the face, becoming a silent dew of the digital age.

The mobile phone is the tool I use most in my daily life. Through its screen, it represents another space connected to the real world. It forms an entire series. I aim to highlight the fragmentation of information carried by phones, both through their number and their varied forms.

Galeries d'art draws its inspiration from my teenage memories, when I used to sneak into cybercafés after school. I incorporate the intensity of PUBG explosions, while nature appears only through a screen. Through my painting, I blur the boundary between the digital world and reality.

This work stems from the memory of my first time using a computer at the age of twelve. It was a grey, block-shaped Windows machine. I shared my life online and gained many followers. You had to wait quite a while for the computer to start up. Just like this controller, it wasn't particularly fast or intelligent.

My work explores ways of seeing through the language of painting, with the computer screen in this piece serving as a distinct point of observation. The content displayed on the screen and the painted image echo and reinforce one another.

This work grew out of my own artistic journey. I first discovered François Morellet's work on the Internet, and it profoundly shaped my understanding of contemporary art.

Inspired by his approach, I created several small pieces that eventually enabled me to continue my art studies in France.

This artistic encounter generated a continuity that transcends time and space. After a brief juxtaposition, I now follow my own path of artistic research, enriched by that moment of discovery.

Inspired by the painting Saint Joseph on His Deathbed, this work transposes the theme of memory into the digital age. It reflects on the digital legacy a person leaves behind after death: their information preserved in a phone, their traces of life revealed through the data stored within the device. In the digital river, information replaces flesh; time, transformed into data, hides within every gaze and counter-gaze.

Georgi@'s Flower is a series of painting-objects inspired by a flower by Georgia O'Keeffe, reinserted into smartphone interfaces. The work questions how images circulate and are consumed today.

The flower becomes a re-produced, commodified sign—an object to buy, like, or capture—replaced by its versions and simulacra.

The title “Georgi@” links O'Keeffe's name to the “@” symbol, marking its shift toward the digital object-image.

<Only 6 item(s) left in stock> is a work inspired by Amazon's purchasing interface. When sellers describe decorative artworks on Amazon, they use terms such as "contemporary art," "modern art," or "master abstract painting." These words carry very different meanings in an academic context, highlighting the distinction between popular art and elitist art—an interesting gap that deserves attention.

When these sellers present artworks through Photoshop mock-ups placed in virtual rooms, it also generates a new interpretation of the relationship between painting and space.

The constraint of the screen becomes, for me, another window. By transposing these scenes into painting, I create paintings within the painting. Through the use of preexisting images, I transform both the act of painting and the act of looking.

This installation refers to Louise Bourgeois's monumental spider, transformed here into an image contained within a screen.

The work places two contemporary gestures in tension: photographing an artwork and contemplating it.

The spider—Bourgeois's symbol of strength and fragility—becomes a mere motif, mediated, captured, detached from its physical presence.

The question is no longer "What am I looking at?" but "Through what am I looking?" Both an homage and a visual trap.

I kept Chinese in this work not as a cultural marker but for its political charge. In the digital sphere, Chinese evokes authority and state control through the imagination it activates. The word 逼真 means "very realistic," yet 逼 also carries a vulgar meaning linked to the female body. This duality makes "too realistic to be shown" both technical and political, exposing tensions between image, gender, and power.

<1.244 kg BANANE VRAC> is a work inspired by the Belgian painter Magritte and his piece Ceci n'est pas une pipe. I transformed real bananas into pictorial language, creating a visual contrast by pairing everyday elements—price labels and plastic bags—with painting.

Another piece uses a garbage bag as a frame for a eaten banana peel. Together, the two works form a combined series, separated by an 11-day interval—the time required to consume 1.244 kg of bananas.

<Chez (1)(2)> is a series of two works in which a mirror and a mobile phone create a connection. I reveal my private space through images, allowing the viewer to satisfy a voyeuristic desire during the act of looking.
