

The background images on my site came from either Pixabay.com, Unsplash.com, or Pexels.com. Though the licensing agreement states that I am within my rights to use them without crediting the artists, I'd like to break the cycle here. Below you can find the artist pages from either site, cataloged to my corresponding web pages. On each page (except for my "planes" page and "Stimulation" page - soon to come) I have drawn several figures to add my own artistic flair to the original images. Specifically, my "Heaven" pages have grief angels on every one but the "HEAVEN Magician" page. I used real statues as references for each page and will also add those details (whatever I may find) below.

Thank you to the artists who are (right now) unknowingly a part of a journey that means everything to me. Your art has inspired me, challenged me to grow more as a creative person, and has reminded me to acknowledge any and every piece of art I come across in my daily life. Every human has an intention behind their creations, and I hope to continue to search for the meaning in everything - forever.

Angel References

I used these statues as references for the angels on my “Heaven” pages. My website is very life or death themed. Grief is a forever process. It never ends and you never stop feeling it. It’s all a part of the cycle. You grow around it, you get comfortable experiencing these things. When you've experienced deep loss it unfortunately makes you a more grateful and sentimental person. So...that's why I chose these. I also love Angels, I think they exist and are a part of everything we do as Earthly beings. They've been here from the beginning.

Here are my references (of the statues hehe):

"Heaven Artist" and Heaven Writer" are the side view and front view of this "Angel of Grief" by William Wetmore Story:
